DANIEL P. MURPHY, Petitioner

v.

STATE OF OREGON, Respondent

PETITION FOR A WRIT OF CERTIORARI TO THE SUPREME COURT OF OREGON

The petitioner, Daniel P. Murphy, respectfully prays that a writ of certiorari issue to review the judgment and opinion of the Court of Appeals of the State of Oregon entered in this proceeding on March 12, 1970.

OPINION BELOW

The opinion of the Court of Appeals of the State of Oregon is reported at Or App 90 Adv Sh 679, 465 P2d 900 (1970). No opinions were rendered by the Circuit Court of the State of Oregon, which was the trial court, or by the Supreme Court of the State of Oregon in denying discretionary review.

JURISDICTION

The judgment of the Court of Appeals of the State of Oregon was entered on March 12, 1970. A timely petition for rehearing was denied on April 22, 1970. A timely petition for review by the Supreme Court of Oregon was denied on June 16, 1970. This petition for certiorari was filed within 90 days of that date. This Court's jurisdiction is invoked under 28 USC § 1257(3).

Questions Presented

1. Whether the search of petitioner is likened to the search of an automobile, rather than to the search of a house, allowing a search and seizure on probable cause, without a warrant, without his consent and not incident to a lawful arrest.

2. Whether there is probable cause for police officers to detain and search petitioner not under arrest and without his consent or a warrant and seize material for investigative determination of the relevance of the material seized.

3. Whether the probable cause for such search may be based at least in part on petitioner's invoking the privilege against self-incrimination and in refusing to consent to such search and seizure or to a polygraph examination upon advice of counsel.

United States Constitutional Provisions Involved

AMENDMENT IV

Security from unreasonable searches and seizures. The right of the people to be secure in their persons, houses, papers and effects, against unreasonable searches and seizures, shall not be violated, and no Warrants shall issue, but upon probable cause, supported by Oath or affirmation, and particularly describing the place to be searched, and the persons or things to be seized.

AMENDMENT V

When prosecution to be by presentment or indictment; double jeopardy; self-incrimination; due process; compensation for property taken for public use. No person shall be held to answer for a capital, or otherwise infamous crime, unless on a presentment or indictment of a Grand Jury, except in cases arising in the land or naval forces, or in the Militia, when in actual service in time of War or public danger; nor shall any person be subject for the same offence to be twice put in jeopardy of life or limb; nor shall be compelled in any criminal case to be a witness against himself, nor be deprived of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law; nor shall private property be taken for public use, without just compensation.

AMENDMENT VI

Rights of accused in criminal prosecutions. In all criminal prosecutions, the accused shall enjoy the right to a speedy and public trial, by an impartial jury of the State and district wherein the crime shall have been committed, which district shall have been previously ascertained by law, and to be informed of the nature and cause of the accusation; to be confronted with the witnesses against him; to have compulsory process for obtaining witnesses in his favor, and to have the Assistance of Counsel for his defence.

AMENDMENT XIV

Section 1. Citizenship; privileges and immunities; due process; equal protection. All persons born or naturalized in the United States, and subject to the jurisdiction thereof, are citizens of the United States and of the State wherein they reside. No State shall make or enforce any law which shall abridge the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States; nor shall any State deprive any person of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law; nor deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws.

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

Petitioner was convicted of murdering his wife and sentenced to 15 years imprisonment. Cir. Ct. Record. A significant piece of evidence against him was material obtained by police officers by scraping under his nails (Tr 311) which material was later identified as skin cells, blood cells and white cotton fibre (Tr 335) and admitted in evidence against him (Tr 344).

This scraping was done without a warrant while petitioner was not under arrest but was being detained, and was done over his objection upon legal advice by his attorney who was present.

A pre-trial motion to suppress this evidence for violation of the Fourth Amendment to the United States Constitution was filed in the trial court (Appendix p. 20) and evidence taken thereon (Tr 28-74), at the conclusion of which the trial court denied the motion to suppress (Appendix p. 21). At the time of offering the material in evidence upon the trial, the pre-trial motion was preserved (Appendix p. 22).

The lawfulness of this search and seizure under the United States Constitution was presented to and determined on the merits by the Court of Appeals of the State of Oregon adversely to petitioner (Appendix p. 11) and the Supreme Court of Oregon denied the petition requesting its discretionary review of the determination of the Court of Appeals (Appellate Record, Appendix p. 26).

FACTS ON MOTION TO SUPPRESS

On August 25th, 1967, city of Portland detectives Prescott Hutchens and William Prunk were assigned to investigate the murder of Doris Murphy. They arrived at the Murphy home shortly after 8:00 A.M. (Tr 28). Visually they could see throat lacerations and abrasions and it appeared that she was strangled (Tr 29, 35 and 54). Deceased was lying on her back in bed and the bed was perfectly made up. There were no signs of robbery (Tr 35). The detectives talked to the son of the deceased and defendant and learned that defendant had been expected home the night before on the 24th of August (Tr 45, 47). Also by calling Camp Sherman and talking there to a Mark Jones they learned that defendant had left there the night before to go to Portland (Tr 46).

In addition they noticed that Pat Murphy, the son, bit his fingernails and it was impossible to scrape them (Tr 41).

Detective Prunk left a death message at Camp Sherman by talking to Mark Jones. At 4:00 P.M. on the 25th defendant called the Portland police station and talked to Prunk (Tr 30). Without asking any questions about his wife (Tr 49) the defendant immediately began to tell Prunk where he had been the night before. He also agreed to come to Portland immediately (Tr 38).

Defendant told Prunk on the telephone that he had left Camp Sherman about 8:00 P.M. the night of the 24th in his old pickup to bring a washing machine to Portland to be repaired and on the way stopped at the Keg and Platter in Salem for a couple of drinks. When he got home the door was locked so he slept in the pick-up parked in the driveway (Tr 37). Early in the morning he woke up and tried to push his truck out of the driveway because it made a lot of noise but it got caught in the step or curb. He drove up to the Sombrero where he again slept until daylight. He took the washing machine to be repaired.

Defendant returned to Portland and went to the police station (Tr 39). When Hutchens saw defendant in the police station he noticed a dark spot on defendant's right thumb. This prompted him to think of finger nail scrapings although he would have anyway (Tr 40, 53, 62). Hutchens thought there was a possibility of this being blood (Tr 54). Defendant had arrived at the police station two hours later. After discussing his case with his attorneys they were going to leave. During this time deputy district attorney Brad Shiley and the two detectives discussed taking finger nail scrapings (Tr 40). Thereafter defendant refused to discuss this matter; refused to give fingernail scrapings or to take a polygraph test (Tr 66) and exhibited a disinterest in the case (Tr 54). Hutchens concluded that probably defendant knew more than he was telling (Tr 54). They thought this and his refusal to discuss the case without his attorney was not the action of an innocent man (Tr 42).

From Pat Murphy, the son, the detectives learned that the deceased and defendant had quarreled previously and defendant about a year before had left bruises (Tr 34), and did not get along well (Tr 35).

Detective Hutchens took the finger nail scrapings (Tr 33) about 10:00 P.M. (Tr 39) or 9:00 P.M. (Tr 53). He would have taken scrapings from any suspect (Tr 63).

The court denied the motion (Tr 74).

REASONS FOR GRANTING THE WRIT

The Oregon Court of Appeals has here determined a federal question of substance not theretofore determined by this Court and has decided it in a way not in accord with applicable decisions of this Court.

ARGUMENT

1. Except in exigent circumstances this Court's decisions have required warrants for searches and seizures absent consent or the limited search allowed incident to an arrest. A house may not be searched without a warrant. Vale v. Louisiana, 399 US 30, 33 (1970) or hot pursuit, Maryland Penitentiary v. Hayden, 387 US 294 (1967). The mobility of an automobile has afforded a basis for a search upon probable cause without a warrant, Chambers v. Maroney, 399 US 42 (1970). Does the mobility of a person likewise allow a warrantless search? No case in this Court stands for so broad a proposition, cf. US v. Di Re, 332 US 581 (1948), Schmerber v. California, 384 US 757, 770 (1966). Where the evidence upon the person has actually been in the process of destruction, such search has been permitted, Schmerber v. California, 384 US 757, 770-771 (1966). But in every case is a person liable to search without warrant, because in every case there is a possibility that the evidence may be destroyed? Cf. McDonald v. US, 335 US 451, 454-5 (1948).

2. Is a search and seizure permissible without warrant and without an arrest because there is probable cause to arrest? Again, no case in this Court sanctions this. Certainly this is not a search incident to an arrest for the arrest was long subsequent. Peters v. New York, 392 US 40, 67 (1967). There appears to be insufficient evidence here to justify any arrest of petitioner for murder, but does not this case instead stand for the proposition that all suspects may be detained for search and seizure, and is this not invalid? Davis v. Mississippi, 394 US 721 (1969); Morales v. New York, 396 US 102 (1969). Is not the search and seizure in this case necessarily exploratory for not only did no one have any assurance whether it would turn up the desired evidence, they had no assurance that what they seized was the desired evidence until it was analyzed thereafter.

3. Here the officers' basis for their concluding they should search petitioner and seize possible evidence was that petitioner exercised his privileges under the Fourth, Fifth and Sixth Amendments. Surely this cannot be used to deprive him of other rights under the Fourth Amendment. Simmons v. US, 390 US 377 (1968), Griffin v. California, 380 US 609 (1965).

CONCLUSION

For these reasons, a writ of certiorari should issue to review the judgment and opinion of the Court of Appeals of the State of Oregon and the order of the Supreme Court of Oregon.

Respectfully submitted,

OPINION COURT OF APPEALS OF THE STATE OF OREGON

Filed March 12, 1970

Dept. 2

State of Oregon,

Respondent,

v.

Daniel Paul Murphy,

Appellant.

* * * * *

Appeal from Circuit Court, Multnomah County.

RICHARD J. BURKE, Judge.

Argued and submitted January 21, 1970.

Oscar D. Howlett, Portland, argued the cause and filed the briefs for appellant.

Jacob B. Tanzer, Solicitor General, Salem, argued the cause for respondent. With him on the brief was George Van Hoomissen, District Attorney, Portland.

Before Schwab, Chief Judge, and Langtry and Foley, Judges.

SCHWAB, C. J.
Affirmed.

SCHWAB, C. J.

The defendant was tried to a jury on the charge of murder of his wife. He was convicted of murder in the second degree. On appeal he contends that fingernail scrapings taken from him against his will were wrongfully received in evidence. The state produced testimony that analysis of the scrapings revealed skin, blood cells, and white cotton fiber. This evidence was obviously introduced as tending to prove that the defendant had acquired these substances under his fingernails by strangling his wife while she was in bed.

At the time the police took the fingernail scrapings they had not formally arrested the defendant. He was not charged with murder or any other crime until about a month later. The defendant's position is that the police did not have a right to search him by taking scrapings from his fingernails without his consent and without a warrant except as incident to a lawful arrest.

We borrow in large part from the statement of facts in defendant's brief.

On August 25, 1967, City of Portland detectives, Hutchins and Prunk, were assigned to investigate the murder of Doris Murphy. They arrived at the Murphy home shortly after 8 a.m. They could see throat lacerations and abrasions and it appeared to the detectives that Mrs. Murphy had been strangled. The deceased was lying on her back in bed and the bed was perfectly made up. There were no signs of forced entry, struggle, or robbery. The detectives talked to the son of the deceased and defendant. The son told them that the defendant had been away and had been expected home the night of August 24. By making a telephone call to Camp Sherman, Oregon, and talking to a Mr. Jones, the detectives learned that the defendant had left Camp Sherman on the night of the 24th to go to Portland. They also learned from the defendant's son that the deceased and the defendant did not get along well and in the past "had fights." While talking to the son the detectives noticed that he had "no fingernails." Through Mr. Jones Detective Prunk left a death message at Camp Sherman for defendant.

At 4 p.m. on the same day, August 25, defendant called the Portland police station and talked to Detective Prunk. Without asking any questions about his wife defendant immediately began to tell Prunk where he had been the night before. He also agreed to come to Portland immediately. Defendant told Prunk on the telephone that he had left Camp Sherman about 8 p.m. the night of the 24th in his old pickup to bring a washing machine to Portland to be repaired and on the way had stopped in Salem for a couple of drinks. When he got home the door was locked so he slept in the pickup parked in the driveway. Early in the morning he woke up and tried to push the truck out of the driveway because it made a lot of noise, but it got caught in the step or curb. He then drove off to another place where he slept until daylight and then took the washing machine to be repaired.

The defendant did return to Portland and went to the Portland police station about 7:45 p.m. When Detective Hutchins saw the defendant in the police station he noticed a dark spot on defendant's right thumb. This prompted him to think about fingernail scrapings although, as he put it, he probably would have anyway in view of the fact that he had observed lacerations on the throat of the deceased. While the defendant and the detectives were discussing the case, two lawyers representing the defendant arrived. The discussion continued after the lawyers arrived and during this time a deputy district attorney who was present and the two detectives discussed taking fingernail scrapings. The defendant refused to give the fingernail scrapings or to take a polygraph test and exhibited a disinterest in the case. Nevertheless, the police detained the defendant long enough to take the scrapings in question and then released him.

By holding the defendant long enough to take fingernail scrapings from him, the detectives did not arrest the defendant in the strict sense of the word. An arrest in its strict sense is the taking of a person into custody for the commission of an offense as the prelude to prosecuting him for it. Terry v. Ohio, 392 US 1, 88 S Ct 1868, 20 L Ed 2d 889 (1968). It follows that the state cannot rely on the rule that "The notable exception to the demand for a search warrant is, of course, the search made as an incident of a lawful arrest." State v. Chinn, 231 Or 259, 373 P2d 392 (1962). This rule, however, is not determinative of the case at hand for, while the incident-to-arrest exception is "notable," it does not follow that it is exclusive.

> "* * * In terms of the quantum of evidence required, this [probable cause for a search] is substantially the equivalent of the probable cause needed for an arrest warrant and of the reasonable grounds needed for an arrest without warrant." LaFave, *Search and Seizure: The Course of True Law * * * Has Not,* * * Run Smooth*, 253 Ill L Forum 259-60, 1966.

In the usual situation, as in this case, the same evidence that constitutes probable cause to arrest constitutes probable cause to search the person arrested for evidence of the crime for which he is seized. Perhaps this is the reason that in many cases courts have upheld warrantless searches which came prior to arrest by characterizing the searches as incident to arrest."

> "Search before arrest is not uncommon in current practice. In some instances, the search precedes the formal announcement of arrest because it is necessary for the officer to act quickly for his own protection. In many instances, however, no formal announcement is made because the officer knows that the person will not actually be taken to the station unless the search proves to be fruitful. That is, in those cases where the defendant might be arrested because of reasonable grounds to believe he presently possesses contraband, the common sense sequence—as far as the police are concerned—is search followed by arrest only if contraband is found, as opposed to arrest, search, and then release if nothing is found.

"In these and similar cases, the better view is that the search is not unlawful merely because it precedes the arrest. Such is the California position, which has been explained as follows:

" 'Thus, if the officer is entitled to make an arrest on the basis of information available to him before he searches, and as an incident to that arrest is entitled to make a reasonable search of the person arrested and the place where he is arrested, there is nothing unreasonable in his conduct if he makes the search before instead of after the arrest. In fact, if the pearson searched is innocent and the search convinces the officer that his reasonable belief to the contrary is erroneous, it is to the advantage of the pearson searched not to be arrested. On the other hand, if he is not innocent or the search does not establish his innocence, the security of his person, house, papers, or effects suffers no more from a search preceding his arrest than it would from the same search following it.' 284."

"284 People v. Simon, 45 Cal. 2d 645, 648, 290 P.2d 531, 533 (1955)." LaFave, Search and Seizure * * *, supra, at 303.

The majority of the Oregon Supreme Court apparently is of the same mind as the California court in People v. Simon, 45 Cal 2d 645, 290 P2d 531 (1955). In State v. Elk, 249 Or 614, 439 P2d 1011 (1968), those who concurred in the prevailing opinion characterized as incident to arrest a car search which occurred 20 to 25 minutes prior to arrest and 200 to 250 yards away. The search was upheld on the basis of a more realistic, workable and theoretically sound rationale in two concurring opinions which represented the views of four concurring justices. While the two concurring opinions were not in complete agreement on all of the issues of that case they shared the same view on the issue we are here considering. The view upon which the four concurring justices agreed is set forth in that portion of Mr. Justice O'Connell's opinion which states:

> "The majority opinion upholds the search in the present case on the ground that it was incident to the arrest. This is erroneous. A search and seizure cannot be an 'incident' of an arrest which took place at a later time. It is not made any the more so by assertions that 'the arrest and search were part of one uninterrupted transaction' or that the search is 'not remote in time or place from the site of the arrest.'
> "However, the search and seizure in the present case can be upheld upon another ground. The information Officer Rothermel had received, together with his observations before lifting the trunk lid, was sufficient to give him probable cause to believe that the stolen gun was in the trunk. Upon the basis of this information, there would have been no difficulty in obtaining a search warrant. But to obtain a warrant it would have been necessary for Rothermel to leave the car and if he left it he could not know when the person who drove the car there would return and drive it away together with the evidence in it. Rothermel had been informed that those who had driven up in the car were in the immediate vicinity. Because of the risk of losing the evidence if a warrant were sought, it was impracticable to obtain a warrant. Under these circumstances a search of the trunk was reasonable." State v. Elk, supra, at 624-25.

If the police had probable cause to search the defendant and probable cause to believe that it was necessary that they search him without taking the time to first obtain a search warrant, their right to search him immediately was not defeated by their failure to exercise their right to arrest him. "There is no constitutional right to be arrested." Hoffa v. United States, 385 US 293, 87 S Ct 408, 17 L Ed 2d 374, reh den 386 US 940 (1966). To hold otherwise would be to require the police to arrest so as to search incident to that arrest. The court should not require greater invasion of privacy where lesser invasion would satisfy the public purpose. Situations exist where arrest would be unwise despite the circumstances of probable cause. Cf. Hoffa v. United States, supra. While the existence of probable cause authorizes state seizure by way of (1) arrest, and (2) search to prevent destruction of evidence (see State v. Chinn, supra, at 267), there appears no reason to require the police to do both or neither. If the public safety is satisfied by the lesser invasion of defendant's privacy, by search alone, the law should not encourage, or indeed require, the police to arrest prematurely in order to justify a search already justified by prior probable cause.

We hold that the right of the police to search without a warrant is a right not solely dependent upon a prior or contemporaneous arrest. The relevant issue is not whether the defendant was arrested, but whether the warrantless search was based on probable cause. The questions basic to this determination are:

(1) Did the police have probable cause to believe that a search of the defendant's person would result in the finding of evidence of homicide?

(2) Did the police have probable cause to believe that if the search were not made immediately without taking the time to seek and obtain a warrant the evidence might well be lost?

State v. Keith, Or App, — Or Adv Sh —, — Or —, — P2d —, handed down by this court March 5, 1970.

The facts in the case at hand justified the warrantless search. At the time the police took the fingernail scrapings they had probable cause to believe that the defendant was guilty of strangling his wife. They did not have evidence beyond a reasonable doubt, but they did have what they needed, i.e., reasonable ground for suspicion supported by circumstances sufficiently strong in themselves to warrant a cautious man in the belief. State v. Keith, supra.

One of the detectives who had had previous experience in this type of homicide knew that throat lacerations were frequently produced by fingernails and that evidence in the form of blood, skin and fibers could sometimes be found under the fingernails of assailants in such cases. At the time the detectives took the scrapings they knew:

The bedroom in which the wife was found dead showed no signs of disturbance, which fact tended to indicate a killer known to the victim but rather than to a burglar or other stranger.

The decedent's son, the only other person in the house that night, did not have fingernails which could have made the lacerations observed on the victim's throat.

The defendant and his deceased wife hadh had a stormy marriage and did not get along well.

The defendant had, in fact, been at his home on the night of the murder. He left and drove back to central Oregon claiming that he did not enter the house or see his wife. He volunteered a great deal of information without being asked, yet expressed no concern or curiosity about his wife's fate.

Unless the defendant were bound, manacled, guarded or by some other means placed in a position where he could not clip his fingernails, scrape the nails of one hand with the nails of another, put his fingers in his mouth or go to the lavatory from the time the police asked him for permission to take fingernail scrapings until the time that they sought and obtained a warrant, it was entirely likely that the evidence would have been destroyed in the interim. Proper application of the Fourth Amendment does not require such extremes. The search of the defendant did not violate his constitutional rights to freedom from unreasonable search and seizure.

Affirmed.

PRETRIAL MOTION TO SUPPRESS IN CIRCUIT COURT

IN THE CIRCUIT COURT OF THE STATE OF OREGON FOR THE COUNTY OF MULTNOMAH

THE STATE OF OREGON,	)	No. C-49322
Plaintiff,	)	MOTION TO
v.	)	SUPPRESS
DANIEL P. MURPHY,	)	AND
Defendant,	)	EXCLUDE

Comes now the defendant, DANIEL P. MURPHY, by and through his attorney of record, Gordon M. MacLaren, and moves the Court for an Order suppressing and excluding the evidence obtained as a result of the illegal search and seizure of defendant's person for the following reasons, one or more than one concurring, to-wit:

1) That the officer effecting the search of the defendant's person failed to secure a search warrant authorizing the search of the defendant's person.

2) At the time of the search of defendant's person, he was not under arrest for any crime, nor did he give his consent for any search.

3) That in fact the defendant, by and through his attorney, made a plain and unequivocal objection to the said search, but that the search was conducted over these objections, by members of the Portland Police Bureau.

4) That the search of the defendant was conducted through the mode and means of inserting a knife blade underneath defendant's fingernails and obtaining therefrom certain items of fingernail scrapings which said items of fingernail scrapings were later turned over to the Portland Police Bureau Crime Laboratory for analysis.

WHEREFORE, defendant prays that the said evidence be suppressed and held by the Court to be inadmissible in this cause against this defendant.

MACLAREN & MCEACHERN
By GORDON MACLAREN
Of Attorneys for Defendant

In argument for the instant motion, attorney for defendant will rely, in part, upon the following points of authority.

U. S. Constitution, Amendment IV;

Oregon Constitution, Article I, § 9;

State v. Krogness, 238 Or 135.

ORDER OF CIRCUIT COURT ON MOTION TO SUPPRESS

THE COURT: Before we proceed further with this trial, as I indicated to you yesterday, I would take this motion, defendant's motion, under submission. And I have studied it and considered the argument and testimony presented by respective counsel on your motion, Mr. MacLaren, to suppress, and feel that the motion should not be allowed.

Now, I will agree with you that the scraping of the defendant's fingernails, as far as this Court is concerned, for evidence, was a search within the meaning of the search and seizure law. Of course, that leaves the crucial question of whether or not the search was a reasonable and valid one.

You will recall that yesterday I indicated that I felt quite strongly that probable cause existed, in this case, for the search. And, add to that, since you finished arguing yesterday, I further feel that, and I think I indicated, the exigencies of the situation, or the circumstances, including the purpose of the search, the manner in which it was made, the character of the evidence seized, and the nature and importance of the crime committed, all add to the reasonableness of the search.

And I further feel that State versus Ramon, cited to the Court by the District Attorney yesterday, 85 Advance Sheets 375, support my finding. And you will recall in that case the Court said that:

"It is not answer to say that the police could have obtained a search warrant for the relevant test is not whether it is reasonable to procure a search warrant, but whether the search was reasonable."

And, for these reasons, the Court is hereby denying the motion. So we'll proceed with the trial. All right (Tr pp 73, 74).

PRESERVATION IN CIRCUIT COURT ON TRIAL

(Whereupon STATE'S EXHIBIT NO. 26 was received into evidence) (Tr 333).

* * * * *

"MR. MacLAREN: For the purposes of the—protecting the defendant's record here, it is agreed between counsel for the State, Mr. O'Dell, and myself, as counsel for the defendant, in the presence of the Court, by defendant's failure to object to the introduction of State's Exhibit 23, which — and 25 —

MR. O'DELL: '6, excuse me, excuse me. Twenty-six.

MR. MacLAREN: Correction: 26 — which exhibits contained the fingernail scrapings obtained from defendant, by not objecting, the defendant did not waive his prior objection, which was in the form of the motion to suppress, which the Court has ruled on, and overruled.

THE COURT: That's right; that's right. By failing to object, you didn't waive any of your rights. And let the record * * * (Tr 344).

APPELLANTS OPENING BRIEF

QUESTIONS PRESENTED IN COURT OF APPEALS

(1) Is a search of one's person by law enforcement authorities made without consent, without search warrant and not incident to lawful arrest a violation of the Fourteenth Amendment to the Constitution of the United States and of Article I, § 9, Oregon Constitution.

(2) May law enforcement authorities effect a search of a suspect to murder for evidence connecting him to the crime solely on a basis of "probable cause" without arrest or search warrant or by his consent.

(3) Under the circumstances present in the instant case was the search of defendant for the purpose of obtaining finger nail scrapings a violation of his rights under the Fourth Amendment to the Constitution of the United States and of Section 9, Article I, Oregon Constitution.

RESPONDENT'S BRIEF IN OPPOSITION TO PETITION FOR A WRIT OF CERTIORARI TO THE COURT OF APPEALS OF OREGON[1]

OPINION BELOW

The opinion below is reported at 90 Or Adv Sh 679, — Or App —, 465 P2d 900 (1970). It is set out in full as an appendix hereto.

JURISDICTION

Respondent accepts petitioner's jurisdictional statement.

QUESTIONS PRESENTED

Respondent offers the following question in lieu of petitioner's statement of the questions presented:

Does the Fourth Amendment allow the police to search a person not in custody by scraping his fingernails without a warrant and without an arrest where there is sufficient probable cause to justify an arrest or a search, but where the delay required to obtain a warrant would likely frustrate the object of the search by allowing the subject to clean his fingernails? Simply said: Does the Fourth Amendment allow a non-custodial search without warrant where there is probable cause to search but where, as a result of exigent circumstances,

[1] Petitioner has prayed for a writ of certiorari to the Supreme Court of Oregon, but, as stated in his brief, the Supreme Court of Oregon declined to review the decision of the Court of Appeals of Oregon. Therefore it would appear that the judgment of the Court of Appeals is in question and any writ should be directed to that court.

the process of obtaining a warrant would make destruction of the evidence likely?

CONSTITUTIONAL PROVISIONS INVOLVED

The Fourth and the Fourteenth Amendments to the Constitution, set out fully by petitioner, are involved. The others are not.

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

Petitioner's statement of the case is accepted.

STATEMENT OF FACTS

Petitioner's statement of facts on the motion to suppress is adequate at this stage.

RESPONSE TO REASONS FOR GRANTING THE WRIT

Respondent opposes granting the writ, but concedes that this case presents purely an issue which merits elucidation by this Court.

THE OPINION BELOW IS CLEARLY CORRECT

It is often erroneously stated as a hornbook proposition that search incident to arrest is the only exception to the rule requiring a warrant for a search. The opinion below correctly upholds a search, without arrest or warrant, based upon probable cause in exigent circumstances which rendered it unfeasible to obtain a warrant.

The defendant was suspected of strangling his wife in the early morning hours. There were laceration marks about her neck. There was probable cause to legally justify an arrest, but there was not yet a sufficiently strong case against him to warrant that drastic action.

The opinion below is clear and succinct. We stand on it. It is set out as an appendix hereto and will not be repeated or reviewed, but a few parallel comments are appropriate.

The Fourth Amendment has received recent conceptual analysis which reflects on this case and would be fleshed out by decisional application to these facts. Terry v. Ohio, 392 US 1 (1968), Sibron v. New York, 392 US 40 (1968), Camara v. Municipal Court, 387 US 523 (1967) and See v. Seattle, 387 US 541 (1967), appear to re-establish the original flexible conception of the Fourth Amendment as allowing governmental responses of varying magnitude in proportion to the gravity of the factual situations involved. The instant search demonstrates just the sort of restraint and discretion which should not only be tolerated under the Fourth Amendment, but encouraged as preferable to more drastic permissible alternatives.

To hold otherwise would be to unwisely require the police to arrest prematurely in a situation such as this so as to enable them to search incident to that arrest. The Fourth Amendment surely does not encourage or require a greater invasion of privacy where a lesser invasion would satisfy the public need. This Court has recognized that situations such as this exist where arrest would be unwise despite the existence of probable cause (cf., Hoffa v. United States, 385 US 293 (1966)). Thus if probable cause exists to justify search and arrest, there is no reason to require both invasions of liberty when the search alone would serve the public safety. Compared to the stunning ramifications of a full arrest for murder as authorized here by the Fourth Amendment, the mere scraping of fingernails is a minimal deprivation and should be recognized as reasonable.

It should be noted that this Court has long recognized probable cause warrantless searches, but it has done so under the theory that they are incident to tentative prior arrests or arrests which follow the search, e.g., in Draper v. United States, 358 US 307 (1959), and McCray v. Illinois, 386 US 300 (1967). In each of those cases, a search was made based upon probable cause in circumstances which did not allow for obtaining a warrant. Because the narcotics were found, the defendant was taken into custody; had they not been found, the defendant would not have been taken into custody and the cases would never have reached court. This case provides the opportunity to characterize such situations for what they are: warrantless searches of the person based upon probable cause in exigent circumstances. Such searches should be rationally validated.

CONCLUSION

This case presents an idea in pure form for review. Such review would allow the clear exposition of a body of law which would provide guidance to police, counsel and the trial courts. Solely because of the interest of the plaintiff in preserving its conviction, however, the petition for a writ of certiorari is opposed.

Respectfully submitted,

APPENDIX

No. 164—March 12, 1970

IN THE COURT OF APPEALS OF THE STATE OF OREGON

Department 2.

STATE OF OREGON, Respondent, v.
DANIEL PAUL MURPHY, Appellant.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Multnomah County.

RICHARD J. BURKE, Judge.

Argued and submitted January 21, 1970.

Oscar D. Howlett, Portland, argued the cause and filed the briefs for appellant.

Jacob B. Tanzer, Solicitor General, Salem, argued the cause for respondent. With him on the brief was George Van Hoomissen, District Attorney, Portland.

Before SCHWAB, Chief Judge, and LANGTRY and FOLEY, Judges.

AFFIRMED.

SCHWAB, C. J.

The defendant was tried to a jury on the charge of murder of his wife. He was convicted of murder in the second degree. On appeal he contends that fingernail scrapings taken from him against his will were wrongfully received in evidence. The state produced testimony that analysis of the scrapings revealed skin, blood cells, and white cotton fiber. This evidence was obviously introduced as tending to prove that the defendant had acquired these substances under his fingernails by strangling his wife while she was in bed.

At the time the police took the fingernail scrapings they had not formally arrested the defendant. He was not charged with murder or any other crime until about a month later. The defendant's position is that the police did not have a right to search him by taking scrapings from his fingernails without his consent and without a warrant except as incident to a lawful arrest.

We borrow in large part from the statement of facts in defendant's brief.

On August 25, 1967, City of Portland detectives, Hutchins and Prunk, were assigned to investigate the murder of Doris Murphy. They arrived at the Murphy home shortly after 8 a.m. They could see throat lacerations and abrasions and it appeared to the detectives that Mrs. Murphy had been strangled. The deceased was lying on her back in bed and the bed was perfectly made up. There were no signs of forced entry, struggle, or robbery. The detectives talked to the son of the deceased and defendant. The son told them that the defendant had been away and had been expected home the night of August 24. By making a telephone call to Camp Sherman, Oregon, and talking to a Mr. Jones, the detectives learned that the defendant had left Camp Sherman on the night of the 24th to go to Portland. They also learned from the defendant's son that the deceased and the defendant did not get along well and in the past "had fights." While talking to the son the detectives noticed that he had "no fingernails." Through Mr. Jones Detective Prunk left a death message at Camp Sherman for defendant.

At 4 p.m. on the same day, August 25, defendant called the Portland police station and talked to Detective Prunk. Without asking any questions about his wife defendant immediately began to tell Prunk where he had been the night before. He also agreed to come to Portland immediately. Defendant told Prunk on the telephone that he had left Camp Sherman about 8 p.m. the night of the 24th in his old pickup to bring a washing machine to Portland to be repaired and on the way had stopped in Salem for a couple of drinks. When he got home the door was locked so he slept in the pickup parked in the driveway. Early in the morning he woke up and tried to push the truck out of the driveway because it made a lot of noise, but it got caught in the step or curb. He then drove off to another place where he slept until daylight and then took the washing machine to be repaired.

The defendant did return to Portland and went to the Portland police station about 7:45 p.m. When Detective Hutchins saw the defendant in the police station he noticed a dark spot on defendant's right thumb. This prompted him to think about fingernail scrapings although, as he put it, he probably would have anyway in view of the fact that he had observed lacerations on the throat of the deceased. While the defendant and the detectives were discussing the case, two lawyers representing the defendant arrived. The discussion continued after the lawyers arrived and during this time a deputy district attorney who was present and the two detectives discussed taking fingernail scrapings. The defendant refused to give the fingernail scrapings or to take a polygraph test and exhibited a disinterest in the case. Nevertheless, the police detained the defendant long enough to take the scrapings in question and then released him.

By holding the defendant long enough to take fingernail scrapings from him, the detectives did not arrest the defendant in the strict sense of the word. An arrest in its strict sense is the taking of a person into custody for the commission of an offense as the prelude to prosecuting him for it. Terry v. Ohio, 392 US 1, 88 S Ct 1868, 20 L Ed 2d 889 (1968). It follows that the state cannot rely on the rule that "The notable exception to the demand for a search warrant is, of course, the search made as an incident of a lawful arrest." State v. Chinn, 231 Or 259, 373 P2d 392 (1962). This rule, however, is not determinative of the case at hand for, while the incident-to-arrest exception is "notable," it does not follow that it is exclusive.

> "* * * In terms of the quantum of evidence required, this [probable cause for a search] is substantially the equivalent of the probable cause needed for an arrest warrant and of the reasonable grounds needed for an arrest without warrant." LaFave, *Search and Seizure: The Course of True Law * * * Has Not * * * Run Smooth*. 225 Ill L Forum 259-60, 1966.

In the usual situation, as in this case, the same evidence that constitutes probable cause to arrest constitutes probable cause to search the person arrested for evidence of the crime for which he is seized. Perhaps this is the reason that in many cases courts have upheld warrantless searches which came prior to arrest by characterizing the searches as "incident to arrest."

> "Search before arrest is not uncommon in current practice. In some instances, the search precedes the formal announcement of arrest because it is necessary for the officer to act quickly for his own protection. In many instances, however, no formal announcement is made because the officer knows that the person will not actually be taken to the station unless the search proves to be fruitful. That is, in those cases where the defendant might be arrested because of reasonable grounds to believe he presently possesses contraband, the common sense sequence—as far as the police are concerned—is search followed by arrest only if contraband is found; as opposed to arrest, search, and then release if nothing is found.
> "In these and similar cases, the better view is that the search is not unlawful merely because it precedes the arrest. Such is the California position, which has been explained as follows:
> " 'Thus, if the officer is entitled to make an arrest on the basis of information available to him before he searches, and as an incident to that arrest is entitled to make a reasonable search of the person arrested and the place where he is arrested, there is nothing unreasonable in his conduct if he makes the search before instead of after the arrest. In fact, if the person searched is innocent and the search convinces the officr that his reasonable belief to the contrary is erroneous, it is to the advantage of the person searched not to be arrested. On the other hand, if he is not innocent or the search does not establish his innocence, the security of his person, house, papers, or effects suffers no more from a search preceding his arrest than it would from the same search following it' ⁂"

"⁂ People v. Simon, 45 Cal. 2d 645, 648, 290 P.2d 531, 533 (1955)." 1 LaFave, Search and Seizure * * *, supra, at 303.

The majority of the Oregon Supreme Court apparently is of the same mind as the California Court in People v. Simon, 45 Cal2d 645, 290 P2d 531 (1955). In State v. Elk, 249 Or 614, 439 P2d 1011 (1968), those who concurred in the prevailing opinion characterized as incident to arrest a car search which occurred 20 to 25 minutes prior to arrest and 200 to 250 yards away. The search was upheld on the basis of a more realistic, workable and theoretically sound rationale in two concurring opinions which represented the views of four concurring justices. While the two concurring opinions were not in complete agreement on all of the issues of that case they shared the same view on the issue we are here considering. The view upon which the four concurring justices agreed is set forth in that portion of Mr. Justice O'CONNELL'S opinion which states:

"The majority opinion upholds the search in the present case on the ground that it was incident to the arrest. This is erroneous. A search and seizure cannot be an 'incident' of an arrest which took place at a later time. It is not made any the more so by assertions that 'the arrest and search were part of one uninterrupted transaction' or that the search is 'not remote in time or place from the site of the arrest.'

"However, the search and seizure in the present case can be upheld upon another ground. The information Officer Rothermel had received, together with his observations before lifting the trunk lid, was sufficient to give him probable cause to believe that the stolen gun was in the trunk. Upon the basis of this information, there would have been no difficulty in obtaining a search warrant. But to obtain a warrant it would have been necessary for Rothermel to leave the car and if he left it he could not know when the person who drove the car there would return and drive it away together with the evidence in it. Rothermel had been informed that those who had driven up in the car were in the immediate vicinity. Because of the risk of losing the evidence if a warrant were sought, it was impracticable to obtain a warrant. Under these circumstances a search of the trunk was reasonable." State v. Elk, supra, at 624-25.

If the police had probable cause to search the defendant and probable cause to believe that it was necessary that they search him without taking the time to first obtain a search warrant, their right to search him immediately was not defeated by their failure to exercise their right to arrest him. "There is no constitutional right to be arrested." Hoffa v. United States, 385 US 293, 87 S Ct 408, 17 L Ed 2d 374, reh den 386 US 940 (1966). To hold otherwise would be to require the police to arrest so as to search incident to that arrest. The court should not require greater invasion of privacy where lesser invasion would satisfy the public purpose. Situations exist where arrest would be unwise despite the circumstances of probable cause. Cf. Hoffa v. United States, supra. While the existence of probable cause authorizes state seizure by way of (1) arrest, and (2) search to prevent destruction of evidence (see State v. Chinn, supra, at 267), there appears no reason to require the police to do both or neither. If the public safety is satisfied by the lesser invasion of defendant's privacy by search alone, the law should not encourage, or indeed require, the police to arrest prematurely in order to justify a search already justified by prior probable cause.

We hold that the right of the police to search without a warrant is a right not solely dependent upon a prior or contemporaneous arrest. The relevant issue is not whether the defendant was arrested, but whether the warrantless search was based on probable cause. The questions basic to this determination are:

> (2) Did the police have probable cause to believe that if the search were not made immediately without taking the time to seek and obtain a warrant the evidence might well be lost?

State v. Keith, Or App, 90 Adv Sh 531, — Or —, 465 P2d 724, handed down by this court March 5, 1970.

The facts in the cast at hand justified the warrantless search. At the time the police took the fingernail scrapings they had probable cause to believe that the defendant was guilty of strangling his wife. They did not have evidence beyond a reasonable doubt, but they did have what they needed, i.e., reasonable ground for suspicion supported by circumstances sufficiently strong in themselves to warrant a cautious man in the belief. State v. Keith, supra.

One of the detectives who had had previous experience in this type of homicide knew that throat lacerations were frequently produced by fingernails and that evidence in the form of blood, skin and fibers could sometimes be found under the fingernails of assailants in such cases. At the time the detectives took these scrapings they knew:

> The bedroom in which the wife was found dead showed no signs of disturbance, which fact tended to indicate a killer known to the victim rather than to a burglar or other stranger.
> The decedent's son, the only other person in the house that night, did not have fingernails which could have made the lacerations observed on the victim's throat.
>
> The defendant and his deceased wife had had a stormy marriage and did not get along well.
> The defendant had, in fact, been at his home on the night of the murder. He left and drove back to central Oregon claiming that he did not enter the house or see his wife. He volunteered a great deal of information without being asked, yet expressed no concern or curiosity about his wife's fate.

Unless the defendant were bound, manacled, guarded or by some other means placed in a position where he could not clip his fingernails, scrape the nails of one hand with the nails of another, put his fingers in his mouth or go to the lavatory from the time the police asked him for permission to take fingernail scrapings until the time that they sought and obtained a warrant, it was entirely likely that the evidence would have been destroyed in the interim. Proper application of the Fourth Amendment does not require such extremes. The search of the defendant did not violate his constitutional rights to freedom from unreasonable search and seizure.

Affirmed.
